COLOMBIAN BULLETS
DIDN'T SILENCE
CIRO ALQUICHIRE.
CANADIAN NEWSROOMS
DID.

Ciro is a veteran journalist. He's interviewed former presidents, covered the Colombian war, and reported on drug cartels. His journalism earned accolades. It also attracted death threats.

In 2002 he sought refuge in Canada, where he hoped to continue practising his brand of investigative journalism in safety.

Ciro has now been in Canada for over 18 years but has been denied employment in Canadian mainstream media. Canada has been more effective at silencing his voice than Colombia was.

WHEN JOURNALISTS ARE MISSING, SO IS THE NEWS.

Immigrant and refugee journalists cover issues that immigrant audiences care about. But less than one-third of immigrant and refugee journalists are employed in the Canadian media industry.

When immigrant journalists are rarely seen in Canadian newsrooms, immigrant stories are rarely told in mainstream Canadian news.

New Canadian Media strives to correct this deficit by hiring immigrant/ethnic journalists and showcasing New Canadian perspectives to better serve the one-fifth of Canadians who are immigrants.

Bring back the news that's missing.

CANADA FOUND IT
EASIER TO IGNORE
ISABEL INCLAN
THAN TO EMPLOY HER.

Isabel worked as a reporter and a broadcaster for radio and television in Mexico for over a decade. She moved to Canada in 1998, with all that experience, and worked as a foreign correspondent for a Mexican newspaper.

In Canada, she covered important summits such as G7, G20 and The North American Leaders Summit. She was honoured as one of the ten most influential Hispanic Canadians for the impact her outstanding journalism has had across communities.

When Isabel's position as a foreign correspondent got cut, her twenty years of journalistic experience in Canada, her awards did not translate into a secure, permanent job. Scores of resumes, cover letters, rejected pitches, and short-term positions later, all that Isabel is sure of is uncertainty.

Canada, with all its promise, has failed to make space for Isabel.

DIARY MARIF.
TARGETED
IN IRAQ.
ISOLATED IN CANADA.

Diary Marif is an Iraqi Kurdish journalist known for covering stories about authoritarian politics and the tyrannical systems in Iraq. His criticism of the two most powerful Kurdish families, the Barzani and the Talabani, led to him being branded a 'betrayer', being compared to ISIS, and being threatened with violence and arrests.

When journalists and writers started getting assassinated, attacked, and arrested, Diary finally accepted that he was in imminent danger and moved to Canada in 2017.

In Canada, Diary found that the price he had to pay for safety was exclusion. Mainstream media here was unwilling to value his abilities and skills. It failed to trust Diary and give him an opportunity to practise his true calling.

The systemic barriers to employment that immigrants face in Canada have succeeded in doing what a tyrannical regime's sword could not. They sidelined Diary's pen.
