Core Memories: A Monologue

INT. Dev's House—Day

Dev

Do you guys ever do things that you've just been consistently doing or seeing since childhood? Like the way you fold laundry now is exactly what you saw your mom do with the basket of clean clothes next to her while she was watching TV. Or maybe you wash the dishes immediately after eating because your aunt taught you that it keeps the dishes from piling up after every meal. I remember when I was a kid, my grandma used to wash my hair in the kitchen sink. I would pull up a chair to the counter and lean my head back into the sink bowl. The water would be so warm and comforting and the marble counter would be fucking freezing in comparison. My Nana was NOT gentle at all.

You guys thought this would be a nice nostalgic story but NAH. She would scrub my scalp hard, digging into all the cracks and crevices, and it was not pleasant. And when she blew it out afterwards, that shit would be hot as fuck. But then at the very end, she would rub some moisturizing oil into my hair and the smell of it, how soothing it was, and how nourished my scalp felt afterwards makes a core memory that I hold dear even to this day.

Dev brings out the Batana oil.

When I found this oil, it brought back all those memories and that same warmth of being nurtured. And not only that, it's suitable for my needs right now as well. I'm trying to grow my hair out, especially my sides and it's helped a lot with the length and keeping my hair thick and healthy during the process. When I have braids, it keeps them moisturized and helps with itchiness as well.
